PREFACE.

A Collection of the Songs of high musical interest to be met with in the numerous Italian Operas of Handel, can hardly fail to secure the approbation of all admirers of that great composer.

I have long wished to attempt this work, and offer a representative selection of some of the best Airs for each kind of voice, accompanied by a pianoforte part specially arranged from the Scores of the several Operas—a desire now accomplished through the cordial and prompt co-operation of the publishers of the present volume.

Such a publication is the more necessary from the fact that a revival of any of Handel's operas on our stage is not likely to be undertaken at the present day; nor, according to modern ideas, would such a representation have the slightest chance of success. These works consist almost entirely of a succession of Songs, divided by numerous Recitatives assigned to the various personages—Recitativi parlanti—often of the most tedious length. An occasional Duet may be found; of concerted vocal music scarcely an example appears, while the occupation of the Chorus consists in making an apparition at the conclusion of the opera and taking part in a short vocal movement, generally composed in one of the dance-rhythms of the period —matters being cheerfully accommodated at the end of the old dramas.

A word remains as to the pianoforte accompaniment. Though Handel experiments boldly in the instrumentation of one or two of his Operas, and with much originality, his orchestral accompaniment frequently exhibits a characteristic disregard of all inner harmony, the Violins and stringed Basses representing merely the extremes of the composition. It is well known that Handel supplied this indispensable want by his own performance on the Harpsichord in the secular works, and—whenever possible—on the Organ in the oratorios and church music.

In filling out the general design, I have adhered to the style of the composer, to the best of my ability, in the pianoforte accompaniment now given. The English version of these Songs has been contributed by Miss M. X. Hayes, and will greatly assist in making these fine specimens of Handel's vocal style more widely known and available to all singers. The Italian text has also undergone a careful revision, and each Song appears in its original key.

January, 1880. W. T. BEST.
